He wasn't an ethnonationalist either because he didn't believe in unifying all members of an ethnic group into a single state. But this whole thing is like asking if Aquinas believed in the neoclassical economic synthesis. There were no nationalists of either variety in his time.

John Winthrop  @JohnWinthrop9 · Jan 26, 2018
Replying to @IgnatiusUnger2
Aquinas didn't believe that you should show up, take an oath of citizenship, and become an equal citizen (which is the essence of modern civic nationalism). He didn't care about phenotype, but neither do modern Polish/Russian/Ukrainian ethnonationalists (same phenotype).

John Winthrop  @JohnWinthrop9 · Jan 26, 2018
The classic "civic nations" in the modern sense are post-revolutionary France and the US, where adherence to language and ideology (and citizenship) makes you French or American even if you just arrived.

John Winthrop  @JohnWinthrop9 · Jan 26, 2018
Serbs & Croats are the same race/phenotype in the modern sense, but Serbian and Croatian ethnonationalists don't see themselves as members of the same nation.

John Winthrop  @JohnWinthrop9 · Jan 26, 2018
Anthony D. Smith (the originator of the civic/ethnic nationalist distinction) said "ethnicity refers to common descent." It should be noted that ethnonationalism is not racial/phenotypic nationalism.

John Winthrop  @JohnWinthrop9 · Jan 26, 2018
Civic nationalism is as modern a concept/phenomenon as ethnonationalism and modern versions of race, so calling Aquinas a civic nationalist is also backward projection.

Modernity provides technological means to suppress fertility not available for most of human history and short-term financial incentives to suppress it. It also seems easier for govts to suppress it than promote it (e.g., China, S. Korea, Singapore are learning this).

Mark Zuckerberg  @markzuckerberg · Aug 23, 2017
We spent a lot of time over the past year meeting with news organizations to talk about how we can work better together. As more people get more of their news from places like Facebook, we have a responsibility to create an informed community and help build common understanding. We can't do that without journalists, but we also know that news organizations can make it harder for publishers to fund the journalism we rely on. To be a better partner to the news media, we started the News Fund to help publishers work with us to work together with newsrooms to develop products like Instant Articles and tools for journalists to report their stories. We're also working with publishers, researchers and universities to help people become more informed about the news they're reading online. As part of this, we're going to test new ways to help news organizations grow their audience. If people subscribe after seeing news stories on Facebook, the money will go directly to publishers who work hard to uncover the truth, and Facebook won't take a cut. We plan to start with a small group of U.S. and European publishers later this year and we'll listen to their feedback. We're also making an update this week to help more people see where the news they read on Facebook comes from. Now when people search for an article or see one that's trending, they'll also see publisher logos next to the article. This update came from conversations we had with news publishers around the world. Eventually, we're going to roll out a publisher's logo next to every news story on Facebook so everyone can understand more about what they're reading. Giving people a voice is not enough without having organizations dedicated to uncovering new information and analyzing it. We're going to keep experimenting with different ways to support the news industry and make sure reporters and publishers everywhere can keep doing their important work.

Poking around Google Books a bit to see what Confederate monument-builders said they were trying to say. St. Louis, 1915:

The principal inscription for the monument was written by Dr. R. C. Cave, noted lecturer and writer of St. Louis, and is as follows: "To the memory of the soldiers and sailors of the Southern Confederacy, who fought to uphold the right declared by the pen of Jefferson and achieved by the sword of Washington. With sublime self-sacrifice they battled to preserve the independence of the States which was won from Great Britain and to perpetuate the constitutional government which was established by the fathers. Actuated by the purest patriotism they performed deeds of prowess such as thrill the heart of mankind with admiration. 'Fall on the front'
